The New Zealand medical examiner told police that Wainwright had a blood alcohol level of more than twice the legal limit, nearly three times the legal limit of .08, and possibly had several drugs in his system. The family said in a statement that Wainwright had donated more than 3,000 units of blood over the past 25 years and that he had been a patient advocate for many years at the hospital. AD AD He has worked in the emergency room for the past 15 years and was a chief of pediatrics and a physician in the newborn nursery for the past five. The 55-year-old had started his shift Monday night at the University of California, San Francisco's emergency room, said hospital spokesman Matt Cagle. "It is shocking," Cagle said. "The hospital is deeply saddened by this news and offers our thoughts and condolences to his family and his colleagues." In a statement, a nurse who knew Wainwright said he was "an exceptional nurse with an affable personality, warm personality, and was always someone to go to for comfort and hugs." She said she was deeply shaken by the news. AD Dr. Kenneth Herkenhoff, a UC San Francisco surgeon who did Wainwright's transplant, said the procedure was "very unusual." AD "For the donor, the procedure is very risky, so they are willing to do it if there is no other way to treat the patient," Herkenhoff said. "It's not common, but it is a special circumstance when it works out." The man's right leg was amputated above the knee to save his life in 2008. That meant organ donation was an option. "As with any organ donor, it is possible that the donor's organs may be donated to other people," Cagle said. "However, this donation is related specifically to the donor, and not to another person."
