His parents, angered by the suspension, have sued the school district, claiming it violated their son's constitutional rights to free speech and religion. Today, the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the school's actions did not constitute state action, and therefore the district did not violate the boy's civil rights. The incident was first reported in late February when the boy was caught carving a swastika into his palm during lunch. He was suspended by his teacher, who reported the offense to the school principal, who then suspended the boy. The boy's parents, upset by the suspension, sued the school district, claiming that the punishment violated their son's right to free speech and religion. The school district argued that the carving of the swastika was a student-on-student issue, and therefore, they were not violating the boy's civil rights by disciplining him. It maintained that the kid's parents were free to send him to a public school outside the district. The boy's parents argued that because their son was an out-of-school suspension, he was no longer a student at the middle school, and therefore they should be able to sue. According to the case: The court acknowledged that the appellant's right to free speech and religion is protected by the First Amendment and applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The court stated, however, that "the Fourteenth Amendment does not provide substantive rights to schools." "A school district is not responsible for the constitutional wrongs of its employees," the court added. "It is not a violator of rights because it disciplined a school official for such a wrong."
