This review summarizes the current knowledge regarding the involvement of cytokines, their receptors, and their signaling pathways in the regulation of ovarian steroidogenesis, follicle maturation, granulosa cell proliferation, luteinization, and ovulation in mammals. Both pro-inflammatory and anti-inflammatory cytokines can interfere with ovarian function. There is evidence that a low cytokine level during the peri-ovulatory period is an important factor contributing to successful ovulation. This may explain why, in most species, the peak levels of the pro-inflammatory cytokines are lower in pregnant than in non-pregnant animals. In addition to the effects on steroidogenesis, cytokines regulate follicle maturation and oocyte maturation. The data available to date suggest that the ovarian regulation of the female reproductive tract involves several factors produced by the ovarian follicle, including steroids, prostaglandins, and cytokines, as well as factors produced by the uterus (uterine production of progesterone, oxytocin, estrogens, and prostaglandins). We suggest that estradiol may act as a feed-back inhibitor for the ovarian production of the major anti-inflammatory cytokine, IL-10, as well as the production of other cytokines that suppress the production of the anti-inflammatory cytokines. Estrogen and progesterone may act on the hypothalamo-pituitary-ovarian axis to trigger an increase in the expression of the local estrogen receptor and of cytokines and their receptors and may also stimulate the uterine production of prostaglandins, prostacyclin, and oxytocin. * @author Suncoast Connection */ class PQRS_0419_Initial extends PQRSFilter { public function getTitle() { return "Initial";
